

The more we know about our healthcare options the better we can all prepare for our future and the future of our loved ones. When it comes to care options for seniors and the elderly, there are boundless amounts of information on the internet that can overwhelm and confuse. Following is a quick reference guide to assist you in understanding the most common care and living options.

Skilled Care vs. Custodial Care

Regardless of the location in which it is provided, at the highest level there are two types of care, skilled care and custodial care. Skilled care describes services that can be given only by skilled or licensed medical personnel. Custodial care (also called non-skilled care) helps with activities of daily living (ADLs), such as bathing, dressing and eating. Custodial care is typical for seniors with Alzheimer's or dementia. Both skilled and custodial care can be provided at home, in adult day care or in a residential care setting such as a nursing home, assisted living community or adult foster care home.

Assisted Living vs. Memory Care

Both assisted living and memory care are residences that offer 24-hr personal care assistance as well as meals, social activities and other amenities. However, memory care is intended only for persons with dementia, usually related to Alzheimer's Disease but also dementia from Parkinson's, Huntington's and most other forms of dementia. There are several differences between assisted living and memory care. Typically, the staff-to-resident ratio in memory care is lower. Security in memory care is increased; external access is restricted to prevent wandering. Different types of recreational activities are organized with fewer offsite outings. Consequently, memory care is more expensive than assisted living by approximately 25%.

Home Care vs. Home Health Care

These terms are sometimes used interchangeably, but there is an important distinction. While both types of care are provided in the individual's home, home care generally means custodial or unskilled care is being provided. For example, assistance is provided with bathing and dressing the individual, help with laundry, cooking and accompanying them to doctors' appointments or on other errands. One may also hear this type of care referred to as personal care or attendant care although those terms are not exclusively for care provided in the home.

Home health care refers to a higher level of care which requires medical training. This includes procedures such as checking the individual's vitals, respiration and assisting with braces, artificial limbs and other medical equipment such as ventilators. To be clear, it is not unusual for home health care providers to also provide custodial care during their home visits.

Adult Day Social Care vs. Adult Day Health Care

Adult day social care provides seniors with supervision and care in a structured setting during daytime hours usually only on weekdays. It is often used to allow their caregivers to go to work. A variety of activities, meals and some therapies are offered.

Adult day health care typically provides everything adult day social care does but in addition has medical services equivalent or almost equivalent to those found in nursing homes.

Virtual Companion Care

This is a new way of providing home care using Internet technologies. Elderly persons living at home alone are provided with a tablet computer through which their safety and mood can be monitored, medication reminders provided and most importantly they can interact with others reducing feelings of loneliness and isolation. Although hands-on care is not provided, virtual companion care holds great promise for reducing the cost of care and improving the lives of elderly persons living at home alone.

Palliative Care vs. Hospice Care

Palliative is a type of care that focuses on relieving patients of their pain and suffering instead of medical care which has the objective curing or treating the underlying conditions. Hospice care, on the other hand is an encompassing approach to treating terminally ill patients in the last weeks or months of their lives. While hospice very often includes palliative care, not all persons receiving palliative care are in hospice.

Residential Care Comparison Table

There are four categories of residential care communities and each is referred to by many different names.

- 1) Independent Living / Senior Living – homes within a complex that offers transportation, security and recreational activities, but no health care services.
- 2) Assisted Living – residences provide help with activities of daily living including basic health services, recreational and social activities but not skilled nursing care.
- 3) Skilled Nursing Homes – residences with 24/7 care by licensed health professionals including all housekeeping, medical and social needs.
- 4) Continuing Care Retirement Communities – residences that provide a continuum of care from independent living to assisted living to skilled nursing. These are designed to enable seniors with progressively declining health to remain in a single residential location or give healthy seniors the peace of mind that all their future needs are covered.
